CHAPTER V.

"Where was the body found?" he asked.

Theydon led the way to the bedroom. He related Steingail's theory of the crime and pointed out its seeming aimlessness. So far as the police could ascertain from the half-crazed servant, none of Mrs. Lester's jewels was missing. Even her gold hurse, containing a roll of notes, was found on the dressing table. He did not know that the detectives had taken away a few scraps of torn paper thrown carelessly into the grate, and had carefully gathered up a tiny snake-like curl of white ash from the tiled hearth, which, on analysis, would probably prove to be the remains of the joss stick.

Forbes gazed at the impression on the side of the bed as though the body of the woman whom he had last seen in full possession of her grace and beauty were still lying there. The vision seemed to affect him profoundly. He did not speak for fully a minute, and when speech came, his voice was low and strained.

"Tell me everything you know," be said. "The bureau men took an unusual step in admitting you to their conclave. They must have had some motive. Tell me what they suidmost. Tell me what they suidmost. They words, if you can recall their very words, if you can recall them."

Theydon was uncomfortably aware.
